Federal communications laws do not preempt warranty and consumer protection claims regarding the sale of a cellular telephone that could only work on the provider’s network or that allegedly emitted harmful radiation. But another court held that federal law preempted warranty and consumer fraud claims based on a wireless carrier’s failure to deliver the promised level of connectivity, on the theory that these claims related to market entry and rates, which the federal law specifically preempts.

Footnotes

Source URL: https://library.nclc.org/cwl/01070803